We tend to be our own biggest critics, when obviously each and every single one of us has something amazing to offer. It's like the belief that to be successful you need to maintain a 4.0, and that you never make mistakes... it's just not realistic. While I think that the bar needs to be set high, we also need to still remember that each and every one of us is a human being.
I advocate fiercely for Phi Theta Kappa. I'm willing to sacrifice and fight for what's right even if that means going against popular opinion. From which I am able to enhance my skills as a leader, a second-chance taker, a fearless learner, and an advocate for real and lasting change. I have been pushed past what I would have ever thought was possible and wouldn't be where I am today if not for PTK.

Phi Theta Kappa has given me a platform. From which I am able to enhance my skills as a leader, a second-chance taker, a fearless learner, and an advocate for real and lasting change. I have been pushed past what I would have ever thought was possible and wouldn't be where I am today if not for PTK.
